SPACE LAW AND POLICY COURSE FOR UNIVERSITY STUDENTS

COURSE INFORMATION AND ENROLMENT FORM

CHARLES CLORE HOUSE, RUSSELL SQUARE, LONDON
SATURDAY, 16 MAY 2015 1 – 5 PM

ISPL is pleased to announce the 2015 space law and policy course for university students.

Our courses are normally intended for high-level practitioners and civil servants. This is an excellent opportunity for those beginning their careers to learn about the law as it applies to the increasing range of activities in space, and the policies that are the foundation for the legal regime.

This is a half-day intensive lecture class for students with an interest in these areas. The course will be held on Saturday to enable them to avoid missing their regular lectures and seminars.

No previous knowledge of space law or policy is required. Students in any discipline are welcome, including law, engineering and technology, government, business and commercial studies. They will receive a briefing in the sources of space law, an introduction to aspects of policy, and a wide range of other related material. There is no examination. There will be ample time for discussion and questions.

SUBJECT MATTER

No previous knowledge of space technology or law is required. It will be of interest to those considering a career in international public law, government, or in the space sector, among other fields. We also expect engineering, technical and medical students to attend. The course will cover:

- The space environment and space technology
- Orbits, their characteristics and management, and types of spacecraft
- The law governing space activities:
  - Principles & sources of space law, including conventions and treaties, national law
  - Peaceful use of space, military activities & arms control
  - Property rights
  - The law as relates to specific applications:
    - Telecommunications and broadcasting;
    - Remote sensing;
    - Scientific experiment and exploration; and
    - Manned activities including the International Space Station.
  - Space policy, its relationship to space law, and institutions that implement them.

A recommended reading list will be provided for those who wish to pursue the material in more depth, or to prepare for the course by prior study of the source documents.

This course is restricted to undergraduate and higher-level academic students.
